The mission of Fullerton Heritage is to foster an appreciation of our city's cultural history and to ensure the preservation of our historic architectural resources and environments.

Storybook Ranches: Enchantment For Sale

by Deb Ritchey

Following World II, the United States suffered from a severe housing shortage, and from 1945 to 1965, Americans purchased more than thirteen million homes, most of them in the new ranch and split-level styles. To returning veterans, the ranch house was the symbol of the American Dream – a chance to marry and raise a family in their own home on their own private plot of land in a safe and prosperous community. The ranch-style house would become the single most prolific residential design in Fullerton and throughout the nation. A rectangular or L-shaped house, the ranch house's long, narrow, and horizontal profile allowed builders to add different architectural elements to the exterior while retaining the typical form and massing of the often rambling dwellings. Unlike previous homes designed and constructed by architects and local builders, most of the ranches would be constructed by little-known firms that served as developers of suburban communities.

One very popular sub-type of the ranch-style house was the nostalgic and whimsical

Baggage Cart Restoration

by Terry Galvin

More than 25 years ago, Amtrak donated two baggage carts to the City for display at the depot. The older of the two had been in use at the depot since the 20s or 30s. The newer one had been used there since the early 1980s, but was brought here from another depot that was closed, so it is more likely from the 40s. The exact ages are unknown.

The years have not been kind to them and the City had proposed discarding them. Fullerton Heritage was asked if there was any interest in restoring them. In the mid-1980s, the City planned to install new fencing and landscaping in the area west of the depot building where they were parked and used as placeholders for landscaping with the idea that they could be put back if they were restored.

In order to avoid disposing of them at that time, they were moved onto the loading dock at the east end of the depot, where they were unfortunately placed unprotected under the peak of the roof that leaked, and where they continued to deteriorate. In 2012, a local rail group agreed to restore them and they were moved to the adjacent spur track. In 2013 they decided not to do the work. They had dismantled the older cart, disposed of most of the wood and stored the remains of the two on the spur track. After Fullerton Heritage was successful in restoring the loading dock roof in 2015, the city requested that the carts be brought back to the loading dock, where they remained in pieces until 2017 when Fullerton Heritage began seeking ways of having them restored.

Today, the older of the two baggage carts is in the process of being restored by the owner of RWB Party Props in Orange.
